RESTAURANTS

Anthony Bourdain famously said: "Context and memory play powerful roles in all the truly great meals in one's life." Pasadena shares that exact sentiment. The culinary scene is an inspiring paradise for palettes. It's a breeding ground for emerging young chefs and the stomping ground for seasoned veterans. Restaurants in Pasadena are so original, foodies drive in from the furthest bounds of coastal regions. With more than 500 restaurants, there's everything you can imagine here. Fine dining. Festive brunches. Authentic Mexican. Creative sandwich shops. Food trucks. Vegan joints. Hipster hot spots. Juice bars. Bustling cafes. Historic mainstays. Undiscovered gems.

A new upscale Mexican restaurant has been the talk of the town, it is called Maestro and it opened in Old Pasadena earlier this year. The chef, Daniel Godinez is a native of Acapulco, Mexico, his menu—inspired by a backpacking trip to all of Mexico's 31 states—pays homage to the various regional cuisines of Mexico. Godinez's specialty, chilaquiles, is on the brunch menu featuring layers of crispy tortilla chips, omelet-style eggs, seven pepper red sauce, cotija cheese, sour cream, avocado mousse and fresh pico de gallo. Maestro's interior design blends Modernist and Art Deco elements of Los Angeles with a rustic color palette and materials of Mexico. The same attention to detail is reflected in their craft cocktail program with inventive concoctions that highlight mezcal, a spirit made of agave (similar to tequila) that tends to be smokier.

A real standout that helped spearhead Pasadena's contemporary dining revolution is Union. Helmed by James Beard-nominated Bruce Kalman, Union has instantly become a leading restaurant with one of the most famous faces behind the kitchen (Bruce appears on food shows like Chopped). An intimate, yet casual, 50-seat restaurant, Union dishes out imaginative Northern Italian cuisine with a California twist, focusing on farm fresh ingredients.

Equally decadent, Ración brings the Basque region of Spain (once home to the world's best restaurant, El Bulli) to Pasadena, where diners can indulge in exotic dishes like housemade squid-ink pasta or beer braised octopus with dandelion salsa verde.

Lost at Sea

Lost at Sea is a newcomer to Pasadena's culinary scene, it is the result of a former fishmonger and a former sommelier coming together. While the ambiance at Lost at Sea feels much more chic than a Chart House, Chef Tim Carey's approach is decidedly classic and French rather than rustic. The restaurant's wine selection carries just as much weight as the food, Santos Uy—who was Silver Lake Wine's first employee and served as sommelier at AOC—assembled small production and natural wines.

Pie 'n Burger

An oldie but goody is 1960s institution Pie 'n Burger, a fun little diner with wood paneled walls and long, laminate lunch counter with colonial revival counter stools. People come from afar for their award-winning hamburger with cheese. Make sure to bring cash because they do not accept credit cards.

Lincoln's Citrus Buttercream Cake

Should you want to tap into your inner hipster, Lincoln, in a previously abandoned, warehouse-ish building, perfected delicious things in a bowl (from eggy breakfast bowls to colorful shrimp bowls), with some of the best pastries (fresh-baked cookies, scones, cinnamon rolls) this side of the Arroyo Seco. It's the type of place where young millennials Instagram their meals all day long. We don't blame them. Lincoln is #nomnom.
